Best Practices to Developing a Multi-Sector Task Force

- Define the goals and actions of the task force
- Determine the institutional leader of the task force
 - Responsible for staffing and providing authority to task force
- Define the relationship of the task force to the larger group
 - Operates independently (may come back to larger group for help, support, resources, or progress reports)
 - Operates fairly independently (can't commit larger group to anything without permission)
 - Requires permission for any action
- Designate Task Force Chair(s) and Staffing
- Identify critical participants
- Recruit members
 - Either through direct appointment with no application, or by opening membership through applications
- Gather the group, set expectations, establish subcommittees

Gun Violence Task Force Structures

- Creation: Typically by city ordinance, resolution, or executive order. This document should establish purpose, membership, governing rules, meeting frequency, staffing, etc.
- Leadership: Chair and Vice-Chair are typically appointed by the Council Chair or elected by the Task Force as a whole.
- Membership and Appointment: Some task forces had members appointed by the Council Chair or City Executive with no formal application process. Others allow individuals to apply for membership and be selected by the City Council. Membership varied from 9 to 37 members comprised of government staff and institutional/community partners.
- Meeting Frequency: Typically monthly
- Subcommittees: Common topics - schools and education, firearms, health/mental health, social services, domestic violence and sexual assault
- Reporting: May require regular progress updates to the Mayor or City Council or a set timeline for deliverables.

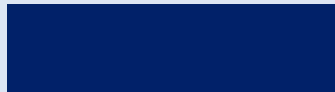

New York City, New York

- The Commission has a regular monthly meeting schedule and must present back to the city council at least once per calendar year.
